plumes, and the action was unceasing. The piece has more of a plot, too, than many of the musical comedies of this season. A marriage has been arranged, through the influence of the German Emperor, between the young Queen of the Dutch and the Prince von Hatzfeld; and the Queen, who has been at school, is recalled by her council so that the ceremony of her betrothal may take place. Having received a modern education, after the English fashion, she naturally revolts against the suggestion of marriage without love; and though she knows her opposition is futile, she registers her last protest against conventionality by running away from the escort little satistaction to those who love this form of amusement. The American public is aware of the universal prestige of this enterprise. Its travels in every land where the sun shines have given it unlimited advantages of gathering together the world's wonders. If there is anything new under the sun it is found under the broad canvas tops of this splendid circus. The circus has a newly built equipment this season, most of it from European factories. On the roll are 1,500 employes and 700 horses are used. A train of five sections conveys the great canvas city from place to place.

It requires fourteen acres of ground to give room to the many tents. The main pavillon, the largest ever built, seats 15,-600 with comfort. The performance takes place in a vast dome, on a half-mile race track, in three rings, and on two stages. The programme is introduced by a spectacle more brilliant and costly than those of the past.
